How dangerous is the oil rig industry?

The dangers inherent in this industry cannot be overstated, as the statistics on oil rig deaths paint a grim picture of the reality faced by these workers. Overall, deaths among those working in the OGE industry rose sharply from 2016 until 2019.

Why are rotary rig fatality rates increasing?

Although the increased fatality rates in 2018 and 2019 compared with earlier years might suggest less safe working conditions resulting from high demand in the industry, the increased rates also might result from increases in drilling efficiency, which leads to lower numbers of active rotary rigs.

How many rotary rig fatalities per 100 active rigs?

* No. of fatalities per 100 active rotary rigs. + N = 401 FOG fatalities; N = 575 CFOI fatalities. TABLE 4.

What are the most common fatalities in the OGE industry?

Unique database variables created to characterize fatalities in the OGE industry (i.e., phase of operation, worker activity, working alone, and working unobserved) were identified in approximately 85% of OGE worker fatality cases. The most frequent fatal events were vehicle incidents (26.8%), contact injuries (21.7%), and explosions (14.5%).

Why should oil & gas companies monitor worker fatalities?

Continued surveillance of worker fatalities in the OGE industry can help identify new safety and health hazards, especially as demand for oil and gas continues and characteristics of the OGE workforce and technology constantly change.

Which state has the most oil rig fatalities?

Accounting for approximately 40% of U.S. oil production (34), the Permian Basin had the largest proportion of worker fatalities in the FOG database (31.5%). Worker fatalities in the FOG database are largely concentrated in Texas, which is the top oil- and gas-producing state with the majority of active rotary rigs and OGE workers (9,28,35).
